With some of the biggest films of the year still unconfirmed (and likely to remain so until closer to the Oscar nominations on January 22nd), there's still no lack of things to talk about. One of the biggest topics is Marvel's upcoming superhero epic, Black Panther. Long considered by many to be Marvel's best movie ever, the film is likely to claim the Best Picture Oscar in 2019. Despite this, Black Panther's success has been slowly fizzling out, with one of the movie's biggest stars recently admitting that the franchise is likely to be dead. To his credit, the often controversial actor claims that his Oscar acceptance speech would have been totally different if Black Panther hadn't been nominated for Best Picture. "I think I would have talked about the film, I would have talked about the song," Ryan Coogler said in a recent interview. "And I'm like, 'Dang, I wish I would have written a song for that.'" Whether Coogler has a point or not, it's hard to argue that Black Panther wouldn't have been an excellent choice of the Best Picture. The film's opening scene sees T'Challa (Chadwick Boseman) assume control of the kingdom of Wakanda with a new name and a new set of followers. This makes for a high-octane and stunningly crafted origin story for a superhero. While Black Panther and its 2018 follow-up, Avengers: Infinity War, may have aged better than Marvel Studios' other big movies (Age of Ultron, The Incredible Hulk, Iron Man 3), they were never going to be able to touch the success of Captain America: Civil War. Both offered the superhero brand a fresh start, a chance
