although these stunts are often over quickly, they can cause big headaches for officials in the communities where they occur. on monday, after local-news website arlnow reported the ligma hack, arlington county chief information officer jack belcher asked his colleagues what wouldve happened if the hacker had left a less innocuous message. the attackers access the accounts

using a technique called credential stuffing. they search lists of exposed usernames/email addresses and passwords obtained from the hacks of other online services that are posted online. they then try using these credentials to log into fortnites site. when one of these credentials works, its because the legitimate fortnight gamer reused their password from another service. when a victim authenticates, the accounts.epicgames.com service redirects the user to the given url, which in the case of the fortnite game hack example redirects to the games login url. if the user authenticates, the attacker can gain access to the user account and password. because of this, theres no real way to protect against attacks like this. anybody can access and change these signs if they know how to program or if they are able to find the right password for the server. and unfortunately, theres no real way to enforce anyone to use a strong password. theres a few workarounds however. first of all, you need to ensure that there are no default passwords for your sso provider. in the case of the example above, it seems that the only one of the 3 default credentials available in the sso providers login url is the client_id. you can use the http basic authentication to provide a custom username and password for the sso provider.

the first way to gain full control of the users pc is to simply install malicious software, which can bypass security settings on the users pc and monitor users in real time as they run legitimate applications. once this is done the user will be prompted to reboot the computer to complete the process. while this is a simple program, its not the only one and its easy to overlook. a second malicious application, called aawas because it was built using microsofts own visual basic programming language, has also seen widespread distribution on the internet. the app was built by a developer named wayne boyd, who was at that time associated with the entertainment industry giant, microsoft corporation. it was created in 2011 and is available free online, but its been available for downloading and using since at least as early as 2013. the app itself does a great deal of surveillance, listening in to and recording various aspects of users activities on their pc. it appears to grab sound, application and system information, sends the information to an unauthorized domain and displays a listening screen. in order to get the most out of the app, it is usually necessary for the user to first run two different programs, one of which, whose main purpose is to login to any game on facebook. in doing so, the aawas app is covertly activated, allowing the user to login to any game on facebook, or any game installed on the users pc for that matter. aawas is in fact a very capable program, and can easily be used by anybody looking to monitor what users are doing on a windows pc. if youre looking for the latest news headlines, you can follow certain social media pages and track twitter, instagram and youtube. if youre looking for music, you can follow artists and follow their music pages, and check out what their listeners are saying about the songs.
