Speaking of working on the ship, you will often see the crew in very busy places. No, I don't mean the bottom of the ocean. They were at work on the decks of the ship. On Mayflower, the cook would be on the forecandle, and the sailors could be found working in the rigging, rigging the sails, and other general repair work. Here are three examples of what some of them might be doing: Using VR is very hard on the eyes. To make VR on a display like the Gear VR work, VR developers must find ways of removing much of the motion of the scene. The Gear VR sees a scene as two images, a left side view of what's in front of the headset and a slightly right side view of what's behind the headset. The left view is overlaid on the right view, so that the left side of what's being simulated is overlaid on the right side of what's being seen. But the virtual boat is moving, and the overlay is shifting, so this illusion is being destroyed. After what I initially thought was just a bit of a frustrating tutorial, the game gets at least halfway interesting. If the Gear VR is set to small virtual screen mode, the boat will be a little bit too big to be easy to handle, so the control scheme will probably become a bit more uncomfortable. It's too late in the game to make any changes to the graphical size of the boat, so Sailaway will look a little too small or a little too large. After about a hundred sailboat races (which are measured in hours), the game will offer you a choice to try the sport of speedboat racing. Speedboat racing is faster and more stressful, so you can be the virtual captain of a real sailboat. I never got to try it.
