Q: How can I show that $|f(0)| = \lim_{n \rightarrow \infty} |f_n(0)|$? Let f_n be a sequence of continuous functions from \mathbb{R} into \mathbb{R} . Assume that $\lim_{n \rightarrow \infty} f_n(0)$ exists. If this limit is zero, how can I show that $\lim_{n \rightarrow \infty} |f_n(0)|$ is also zero? A: Take a sequence $n_k \rightarrow \infty$ such that $f_{n_k}(0) \rightarrow 0$. By continuity of f_n you have $f_{n_k}(0) \rightarrow 0$ for any sequence n

Gender differences in the association between low birth weight and cerebral palsy: analysis of a nationwide birth registry in Brazil. To determine whether low birth weight is associated with cerebral palsy (CP) in infants, and to explore possible gender differences in this association. All children born in Brazil (n = 23,004,918) were enrolled in the 2008 Birth Registry of the Brazilian Association of Neonatal Medicine (ABRAN). Logistic regression models were used to evaluate the association between low birth weight (500 g or less) and CP. Models were adjusted for gestational age (term/preterm), birth weight (low-normal/low), maternal age (< 20/20-34/≥35 years), maternal education (< 8/8-12/≥13 years), and use of prenatal corticosteroids (no/yes). We estimated odds ratios (OR) and 95% confidence intervals (95%CI) for the associations between low birth weight and CP. There were 125 cases of CP, among which 64 (51.2%) were classified as spastic, 36 (28.8%) as dyskinetic and 25 (20.0%) as athetoid. After adjustment for gestational age and birth weight, low birth weight was associated with a near four-fold increase in the risk of cerebral palsy among male infants (OR 4.39, 95%CI: 1.96-9.78), but there was no significant association among female infants (OR 1.71, 95%CI: 0.71-4.14). The association between low birth weight and CP was consistent

What's New in the LazWinServiceMgr?

LazWinServiceMgr is a handy utility for monitoring and controlling any Windows service running on your system. Once installed, it will appear in the system tray and will provide a user-friendly interface to stop, start or uninstall any service.

LazWinServiceMgr allows you to do the following things: - Stop/start any service at a specified interval. - Show a current list of running services. - Stop all running services. - Start a specified service with a specified argument. - Display the service's current status, i.e., whether it is disabled or started. - Delete a service from the registry. - Enumerate the services that can be deleted or restarted. Some Notes on LazWinServiceMgr: - LazWinServiceMgr automatically starts once you restart Windows. - LazWinServiceMgr does not have any user interface. All its operations can be done from the system tray icon. - LazWinServiceMgr only has one window to display all the running services. LazWinServiceMgr Requirements: - Windows 98/Me/NT4/2000/XP with Service Pack 1 (SP1) installed. - LazWinServiceMgr will display any running service in the system tray. The system tray icon will display the list of running services, and when you double click the icon, LazWinServiceMgr will show a new window with a detailed description of the selected service. If the selected service is a service icon, you can stop/start it from here. If the selected service is a running service, you can stop/start it here as well. LazWinServiceMgr is free and there is no catch. You can uninstall it at any time. LazWinServiceMgr was designed to be simple and effective. First of all, LazWinServiceMgr is a Windows service so it will start automatically when you restart Windows. LazWinServiceMgr will look in its own folder to find the list of services that can be stopped, started or deleted. LazWinServiceMgr is a Windows service, so its working and running processes are hidden from your user's view. LazWinServiceMgr will display any running service in the system tray, so you can stop, start or uninstall it by just double clicking it from here. LazWinServiceMgr will display a detailed description of a selected service in its own window. LazWinServiceMgr will list all the services that can be stopped, started or deleted. LazWinServiceMgr will let you delete a selected service from the system registry. LazWinServiceMgr will display a current service
