Chapter eleven of The Dialectical Imagination: A History of the Frankfurt School and the Institute for Social Research, Its Theses, Its Critics, Its Frontiers. New York: Verso Books, 1996. Influence of hyperbaric oxygenation on the clinicobiological parameters in patients with Crohn's disease. Long-term hyperbaric oxygenation (HBOT) has been used in various diseases, but there are no data regarding its effect on Crohn's disease. The aim of the study was to evaluate the effect of HBOT on the activity of the disease and its treatment response. We analyzed the results of 90 patients who received hyperbaric oxygenation (1.4 atmosphere absolute O₂) for chronic, active Crohn's disease. The treatment effect on the activity of the disease was assessed before and after at least 12 months of treatment by a previously described clinical scoring system: Crohn's Disease Activity Index (CDAI). In addition, patients were followed with intestinal endoscopy. We observed the following differences between the pre-HBOT and post-HBOT CDAI scores (both at the end of the intensive treatment period): (1) CDAI ≥ 150 $n = 34\%$ versus 30% ($p = \text{NS}$). The difference between the CDAI at the end of the intensive treatment period and at the end of follow-up (in 30 patients) was similar to the differences between pre-HBOT and post-HBOT CDAI. In 30 patients (69.9%), endoscopic examination showed a clinical improvement in response to the treatment. The initial CDAI values in these 30 patients were higher than in patients in whom the endoscopic examination was unchanged after HBOT,
